Description

This two story frame structure was constructed as Temperance Hall in 1892. It has a shallow pitched gable roof facing the street and is three bays wide. A fourth opening in front is a door opening directly to stairs leading to the second floor. Typical of 1890s construction, windows have two over two panes with arched upper sash within architraves with peaked tops. The main entrance has two-leafed doors and is topped by a two light transom. The second story central window is a larger three-part opening, a kind of "Gothic-Palladian" adaptation.

Built as a meeting hall for the WCTU, this structure was later occupied as a Pithian Hall. It has most recently served as an antique shop. It reflects the important of the Temperance movement in Keedysville's history.
